From the Lexington Observer. The Return to Ashland.

"After life's fitful fever-he sleeps well." Unfold the silent gates, The Lord of Ashland waits Patient without-to enter his domain; Tell her who sits within, With sad and stricken mein

That he-her soul's beloved, hath come ugain Long hath she watched for him, Till hope itself grew dim,

And anguish ceased to wake the healing tears; But let these griefs depart, Like shadows from her heart, Tell her-the long expected host-is here. He comes but not alone,

For thickly pressing on. The people pass beneath his bending trees, Not as they came of yore, When torch, and banner, bore Their part, amid exulting harmonies.

But still and sad they sweep Below the foliage deep, Even to the threshold of that mansion grey, Whither from life's unrest. As an Eagle seeks its nest,

It ever was his wont to flee away. And he once more bath come To that accustomed home; To taste a calm-life never offered yet-

To know a rest so deep, That they who watch and weep In this vain world-may well its PEACE regret. Oh! never more his hall,

Shall echo to the fall Of that proud step, which well his soul expressed No more with outstreched nand, There shall the MASTER stand, To "welcome coming-speed departing guests."

No more the ringing tones Shall fill that mansion lone, Of that rich voice, that touched the inmost soul, And gave to words a power,

They knew not till that hour A music-hallowed by the organ's roll. No more! The soul is stirred By that PUNERAL Word,

As with a grief it scarce bath strength to bear; Oht Godt if Tims were all, The coffin and the pall Might seem indeed the symbols of despair.

If of the great and just, This silent, mouldering dust, Were all remaining-what were being worth! To-day a shining star, Men worship from afar,

To-morrow, mingling with the clods of earth. But THOU hast deigned to shed On the path that mortals tread. A ray of glory, from thy name divine; And teachest those who crave

The life beyond the grave, This very yearning, marked them truly thine. Within his country's page,

The Patriot and Sage, Must dwell enshrined while memory holds her While of our nation's fame, There resteth but a NAME, This shall be treasured as her noblest son.
